

Bull Run Scams 26-11-2025:

Back in 2021, there were fewer than 15,000 tokens and coins on the market. Today, there are millions. The skill level required to write code and deploy on mainnets used to be limited to just developers. Today, platforms like Pump.Fun have made it possible to launch a token in seconds. No whitepaper, no roadmap, no team, just a meme and a marketing hook. In the ICO era of the late 2010s, scammers at least had to try to look legitimate. They built websites, made decks, and shook hands at conferences. Now, during a bull run, all it takes is a trend, a Telegram group, and a well-timed post.

What makes this shift especially dangerous is the illusion of easy money from the investor's side and an easy opportunity from the scammer's side. For buyers, the lower the barrier to entry, the faster hype takes hold. Cheap tokens, viral memes, and instant Telegram chatter create a sense that profits are just one click away. At the same time, for token creators, spinning up a contract has become trivial, which means they can launch dozens of coins in minutes, each designed to ride a fleeting wave of sentiment. This convergence — investors chasing instant wins and scammers mass-producing bait — collapses the window for rational thought. Our brains struggle to evaluate risk at that velocity, and in the rush of a bull run, anticipation overrides caution while reflex beats reflection.

Case in point: it was the height of the memecoin frenzy in early 2025 when Binance co-founder CZ tweeted that he would soon reveal the name of his dog. Scammers immediately prepared token contracts in anticipation of this. The second he named the dog "Broccoli", a scam token went live within seconds. That's how quickly opportunistic scams are moving now. Bull runs don't just attract retail money; they also attract a frenzy of low-effort, high-return scams looking to capitalize on the wave.

But the illusion never lasts. Once enough real investors are caught in the trap, the script executes its final command: all of the scammer-controlled wallets sell simultaneously.
