

How Not to Approach Crypto 27-12-2025:

When users are proclaiming that a certain asset is going “to the moon” all over Reddit, we know it might be tempting to dive all in and buy before The Surge™. Remember, again, the crypto markets are volatile, making it pretty difficult to predict the future of the price – long and short-term.

Looking at the fundamentals is an approach that takes the “intrinsic value” into consideration. It looks at a number of different factors like the use cases of the technology, development potential, investors’ background, how many wallets are active, the transaction volume (how much cryptocurrency is being transacted on average), the technical elements like the amount staked or total value locked, and other metrics. These give you a much better insight into the possible direction in which a cryptocurrency’s value might go.

Certainly, some of them are genuinely looking to offer sound advice. But some of them are either not as clued up as they seem, some are there to try and influence you to a particular project to inflate the price or (an important OR) they’re using social media to con you. Or, in the case of Elon Musk, they’re hyping something to the nth degree without anyone really knowing why. Just take a look at Dogecoin’s value over the past few months to see how much one tweet every so often can impact the price.

“If everyone is buying this particular cryptocurrency, it must be a good idea” is a dangerous trap. While exploring a cryptocurrency because it’s popular isn’t a bad idea, approaching a project without doing any of your own research can lead to trouble. There are thousands of projects with a following and a fanbase but not necessarily a function or a future and investing blindly – and leaving critical thinking at the door – isn’t a leap of faith that’s worth taking. Think of crypto investment a little like learning to swim: If you start diving into the deep end, someone’s probably going to have to jump in to help you. Dipping your toes in and getting a feel for the market is a safer strategy and can save you significantly while you learn the ropes.

Trust us, the high risk – high reward approach works just the same later down the line and it’s not worth going in aggressively before you’re familiar with different elements in the market.
