

Pooled Staking 07-12-2025:

Public Blockchains work entirely on a decentralized ecosystem, with thousands of computers worldwide working together to validate transactions. For this system to work, these computers need a way to trust each other and make decisions together — and they do so using a consensus mechanism. One of the most popular consensus mechanisms for public blockchains today is Proof-of-Stake. But you can't have a Proof-of-Stake network without staking.

To explain, keeping a Proof-of-Stake network secure requires participants, called validators, to lock up a specific amount of cryptocurrency as collateral. These validators process transactions on the network. In return, they receive rewards (or have their stake slashed if they act maliciously).

While these validator rewards are pretty lucrative, becoming a validator requires you to lock up huge amounts of crypto. For instance, Ethereum requires 32 ETH to stake independently, which not everyone might have lying around. Luckily, there are other ways to earn staking rewards without needing to shell out a huge upfront investment. One of the most popular of these methods is pooled staking.

Put simply, pooled staking is a way for users to combine their staking resources to participate in the staking process together. Users combine their funds designated for staking via staking pools. By pooling their funds together, they also receive rewards together. And when it comes to dishing out those rewards, remuneration depends on an individual's contribution to the staking pool. The more you stake, the more you receive— all without lifting a finger. In other words, pooled staking allows you to make passive income without having to worry about validating transactions or locking up more funds than you want to.

A staking pool is a store of shared funds joined together for the purpose of staking as a group. The safety of your funds depends entirely on the staking pool's inner workings and more than anything—its operator.
