

Prediction Market 01-12-2025:

The success of the human species is in large part due to our ability to measure and mitigate risk. So it shouldn't be a surprise that we're obsessed with predicting the future. Prediction markets reflect this desire offering a unique model for rewarding the ability to establish if an event will happen in the future or not.

The roots of prediction markets go back to the early 1900s, when British statistician Francis Galton discovered that the median guess of a crowd at a county fair—on the weight of an ox—was more accurate than any individual expert. This concept of the “wisdom of the crowd” became a foundational idea behind prediction markets.

By the 1990s, companies like Project Xanadu had employees placing informal bets on how the future of cold fusion, a controversial energy tech, would pan out. Around the same time, the Hollywood Stock Exchange—a virtual trading game—let users bet on Oscar outcomes and famously predicted 32 out of 39 major-category winners in 2006

Governments got interested too. In the early 2000s, the U.S. Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) tried launching a prediction market to anticipate terrorist attacks and geopolitical events. But the idea faced heavy backlash and was shut down before it fully launched, showing the fine ethical line these markets sometimes tread.

On modern platforms like Polymarket, users have bet on whether Bitcoin would hit $100,000 or if a specific movie would top the box office. Manifold Markets also hosted bets on whether Elon Musk and Mark Zuckerberg would actually fight in 2023 or if Jesus Christ would return before the next Grand Theft Auto game drops.

In a prediction market, each event is turned into a market where traders buy and sell shares that represent “yes” or “no” outcomes. Prices in this market tend to change based on supply and demand, offering real-time insights to those who participate.

It's like a stock market, but instead of trading company shares, you're trading the likelihood of things happening — like who wins an election, or if Bitcoin will hit $100,000 by year-end, or who will win the FIFA world cup, or any similar event(s) in due time.
