

Solana Blockchain Explained 15-12-2025:

Solana is an open-source blockchain that offers high throughput and low transaction fees for both developers and users, especially when compared to older networks like Ethereum. Its native token, SOL, currently ranks among the top 10 cryptocurrencies by market capitalization.

In 2017, Anatoly Yakovenko, an ex-Qualcomm engineer, published the Solana whitepaper introducing the PoH concept. Drawing from his prior experience in distributed system designs, Yakovenko realized that a lack of a reliable, automated way to timestamp transactions made legacy blockchains inefficient. This forced validators to constantly check in with one another to confirm blocks, slowing transaction execution.

His solution? PoH – a consensus that serves as a cryptographic clock that records the order of events. It was conceptualized to simplify network synchronicity, a realization that led to an exponentially faster network.

Yakovenko later teamed up with Raj Gokal and Greg Fitzgerald to build Solana Labs, which launched the blockchain in March 2020 as a “mainnet beta”, following a series of testnet releases.

Solana quickly gained traction and massive adoption during the 2021 DeFi and NFT boom. Developers flocked to the network, SOL’s value surged, and a Solana wallet emerged for every use case and user. These improvements fueled conversations around Solana being an “Ethereum killer.”

Compared to competitors that depend on layer-2 scaling solutions, Solana aims to achieve scalability at the base layer. It relies on a smaller group of fast, powerful computers to maintain the network and process large volumes of transactions.

Solana uses both PoS and PoH consensus models to achieve its functionality. PoS serves as the security layer, relying on validators who stake their SOL to verify transactions, add new blocks, and maintain the network. The SOL token is also used to settle transaction fees incurred during blockchain interactions.
