

Sui vs Solana 20-01-2026:

Newer blockchains often emerge purporting to offer better user experiences, functionalities, and fewer limitations than their predecessors, all vying for the top spot. Ethereum, in particular, has faced (and continues to face) intense scrutiny due to its high transaction fees and relatively slow processing. This has led to its position as the predominant smart contract platform and hub for DeFi being increasingly challenged. This environment has spawned blockchains often hyped as potential “Ethereum Killers.”

Two platforms that are particularly prominent in the debate for the next-gen blockchain infrastructure are Sui and Solana. Despite their own shortcomings, such as potential concerns about centralization, both platforms address the limitations present in earlier blockchains, offering fast transaction speeds, low costs, and support for diverse decentralized applications (dApps).

Solana’s theoretical 65,000 transactions per second (TPS) and Sui’s 120,000 TPS already place them at the apex of transaction speed in the blockchain landscape. But the battle between these two contenders encompasses far more than just processing speed.

The Solana blockchain is designed to host high-frequency applications such as gaming, decentralized exchanges (DEXs), and consumer-facing apps that require instant finality and low costs.

Sui is also a high-performing layer-1 blockchain, sharing the same goals of scalability, fast transactions, and low fees. It was launched in May 2023 by Masten Labs, created by ex-Meta engineers (from the Diem and Novi projects). Sui aims to optimize the performance of smart contracts and boost the scalability of dApps.

Since its launch, the Sui blockchain has attracted millions of users and developers, partly due to its intuitive experience that is similar to popular web2 applications. Its innovative design, for instance, gives users the option to create wallets using secret recovery phrases (SRP) or via seedless alternatives.
