

Wallet Confirmation Message 26-12-2025:

Cryptocurrency is an innovative, fast-paced, and often complex space, where the UX can often be hard to understand. So if you're regularly interacting with Web3, it pays to get familiar with details – literally.

In Web3, users typically engage by cryptographically signing interactions via their wallet. But not all interactions are the same.

Broadly speaking, you'll find yourself signing two types of interaction – transactions and confirmations. Confusion about these two types of interaction – and how to spot them – is a significant source of scams on Web3. So taking time to fully understand each one, and how to identify it, is a no-brainer for anyone looking to protect their crypto.

Wallet confirmation signatures – due to the confusion over exactly what they are – can be used as part of a scam to exploit users.

Recently, a hacker on allow list registration site PREMINT scammed thousands of users out of the NFTs in their wallet. The hacker was able to publish a malicious “wallet confirmation pop-up” on the website; victims signed the pop-up believing it to be an innocuous wallet confirmation message (standard for allow list registration sites). Instead, it was a malicious transaction – signing it gave the hacker access to NFTs in their wallet. The pop-up containing the transaction looked like an innocent wallet confirmation – and the victims missed red flags, such as the presence of a gas fee, that indicated it was really a transaction.

In another case, malicious sites take your most recent incoming transaction, with the real details about the sender address, ETH amount, and date, and claim that MetaMask requires a signature to accept it. The thing is, incoming transactions do not require any action on the recipient's side. What you're really doing is signing another transaction and losing your crypto. This is why it's so essential to be aware of what you're signing.
